Use of Force Assessment and Risk Management for Instructors

There are four elements that must be present at a minimum level in order to have a use of force to be reasonable. These elements are: Force Knowledge, Force Skills, Decision-Making under Threat, and Force Documentation. Training in all four elements for each type of force is needed to show reasonable training. This course provides instructor level knowledge in all four. Selected Supreme Court and Circuit Courts of Appeals cases. This course also breaks down decision-making under threat into a process. This allows instructors to train and assess decision-making independent of knowledge and skills. It also provides a template if an agency does not have a decision-making process (BLET does not provide one). Documentation of force continues to be a major risk factor for liability. This course provides a process for evaluating use of force reports for clarity and detail in critical areas. Force documentation is one of the least trained and understood elements by instructors. How valid and reliable was you last force documentation training?

This course provides instructors the basis to design and evaluate: training, curriculum, policies, procedures, and supervision in order to identify risks in use of force training and how to manage it. This course provides instructor's legal and training research that allows for targeted training with the required documentation necessary to prove training was reasonable.
